KEY WORDS: asparaginase, leukemia, fungal infections, enzyme inhibitors, protein crystallography

Research topic: Structural and functional characteristic of new asparaginases.

Principal Investigator: prof. dr hab. Mariusz Jaskólski

I. Project description

The aims of this project comprise full structural and functional characterization of selected novel Rhizobium-type asparaginases: the model enzymes from Rhizobium etli (ReAI and ReAII) and homologs of ReAII present in some pathogenic fungi. The results will elucidate the details of the catalytic mechanism probing the new enzymes as new antileukemic agents, with improved efficiency and minimized adverse side effects. This is, however, not the only potential of Rhizobium-type asparaginases. In the second lane of our research, we will be searching for their inhibitors, hoping to find promising compounds that could be developed into fungicides for combating pathogenic fungi of people and agricultural crops. Our research will significantly advance structural biology, biochemistry, enzymology, and pharmacology.
